"The fight against nuclear power and for a clean energy system is indeed about power—power in all of its manifestations. It's not only about whether our electricity is generated by harmful nuclear and fossil fuel power plants or clean, sustainable energy sources; it's about who makes those decisions—the public or wealthy and largely faceless corporations. It's not only about protecting our environment and our health and safety, it's about democracy in its most fundamental form.

Democracy requires an informed and active public. My goal always has been to do my very best to provide the necessary underpinning for democracy: to credibility and accurately inform the public and help it become both active and effective in its advocacy—knowing that, given the choice, an informed and active public—from the U.S. to Ukraine and across the globe—will always choose to obtain its necessary electricity from the safest, cleanest and most affordable sources possible.

Our planet is calling out for a nuclear-free, carbon-free power system. And so are its people. And that system will arrive eventually, it is inevitable. But by confronting political and economic power actively and effectively, we will attain that system in time—and that's critical. That's my role now: to help get us there in time.” —Michael Mariotte
